

A SPECIAL REPORT

Farewell to the Terrace

The vision of a radically expanded UCD campus

The evolution of Belfield's campus has put UCD among some of the best in the world, president Hugh Brady tells Louise Holden

As the last UCD students leave the Earlsfort Terrace campus, the Belfield campus is reaching a significant point in its evolution. President Hugh Brady has a vision for the physical development of the campus which he believes will position the college among the best in the world.

The Belfield campus is unique. At 132 hectares and with a staff and student population of almost 30,000, Belfield can be compared to a small city. Only 25 per cent of the campus space is built on, however, and 10 per cent of that space is currently used for car parks. The rest of the space is green fields, sports fields and woodland. The potential is enormous – realising it takes foresight.

"The core business of a university is teaching, learning and research," says Brady. "We want UCD on the field with the big players such as Princeton, and to do that we must attract the brightest and the best. That means developing the academic infrastructure to the highest possible standards."

"However, there is more. Students demand a great deal from their universities – they want a collegial atmosphere, they are looking for a journey of discovery."

"That is why we want to draw all manner of life and activity into the campus, doubling the number of residents and inviting the wider Dublin community and the world into Belfield."

The Gateway project will be the most visible manifestation of the campus development plan. A shortlist of 10 architectural firms is soon to be whittled down to one, and the winning group will be charged with transforming the UCD entrance off the N11 – the one with which most commuters will be familiar.

"We want to draw people into the university with an exhibition centre, arthouse cinema, retail outlets, a hotel and signature works of architecture that will define the campus," Brady explains.

It is his hope that the new Gateway space will be used by the wider Dublin community in a variety of ways, performing a central civic role. For example, there are plans to build a large public lecture space where speakers can address wide audiences, not just students.

A pedestrian walkway will link the Gateway space to the existing pedestrian 'spine' that students of UCD tread each day. However, change is pending right across the campus.

"We are taking a long-term, holistic view of development on the campus," according to the President. "We have prioritised the retention of green spaces and woodland. Future building development will have a smaller footprint than what has gone before, and we plan to use the sites that are already developed, rather than building into the natural environment."

This commitment includes a 10-fold increase in the boundary woodland and network of pedestrian walkways.

New buildings will be required, especially for R&D activity. UCD is committed to playing a central role in the realisation of the Government's Strategy for Science, Technology and Innovation 2006–2013. This will require added infrastructure, but the Campus Plan allows for considerable development into the future that makes the smallest possible impact on the environmental endowment of the college.

UCD president Dr Hugh Brady at the Belfield campus. Photograph: Matt Kavanagh

The spaces between the buildings are just as important as the buildings themselves

Checking your bonafides at the Friday hop

Students today could learn a lot about unruly behaviour from those who enjoyed UCD's Earlsfort Terrace heyday. John Holden writes

The education and wisdom gained from going to university does not come exclusively from the classroom or lecture hall. As John Henry Newman once noted: "When a multitude of young men, keen, open-hearted, sympathetic, observant... come together and freely mix with each other, they are sure to learn one from another, even if there be no one to teach them; the conversation of all is a series of lectures to each, and they gain for themselves new ideas and views, fresh matter of thought, and distinct principles for judging and acting, day by day."

According to former UCD graduate and student media, politics and sports enthusiast, Gerry Horkan, the extra-curricular activities of Earlsfort Terrace were a huge part of what he and his peers grew to become.

"In my time, there was a great sense that you could go in and do anything in UCD," says Horkan. "Being a young lad from the northside in 1950s Dublin, I didn't have a great family background in academia but I settled into it fairly quickly. I got involved in politics and was on the Students Representative Council (SRC), so I got to know a lot of people in the college."

Horkan was part of a political group led by one Gerry Collins. Their party, which came to be known as "the Machine", controlled the student council for several years because of the support for Collins as leader, and the party's knack for electioneering campaigns.

"In those days there was no left and right in student politics, more rural versus city," says Horkan. "We didn't have a lot of power or money. One campaign I remember being involved in was to get a crystal ball for the dance floor in Newman House. We never got it though."

Newman House hall on St Stephen's Green was the location for dances in the 1950s and 1960s. "We called them the 'Friday night hops'," says Horkan. "They were run by societies or the SRC, and there would always be a few cases of beer hidden under the stage where the drama societies performed in the hall."

"The dances were great for a sing-song and, of course, for dancing, but they weren't for everyone. There was a certain element of students – usually southsiders with money – who wouldn't be seen dead at a dance."

For this element and others, socialising took place in house parties or in the pub. Dwyers, (now Houricans), Hartigans across the road, and the Green Bar, all on Leeson Street, were popular hangouts for Earlsfort Terrace's student population. "The medicine, law and arts crowd hung out in Dwyers and Hartigans, while the Green Bar was for GAA heads and A&S," explains Horkan.

"Students also took advantage of the Bona Fide Travellers law. This meant you could get served after hours if you could prove that you were at least five miles away from your place of residence. So some people would go up to Lamb Doyles and Matt Smiths in Stepside for late pints."

As is the case today, societies were an important part of college life. "The Literary and Historical (L&H) debate was somewhere to go on Saturday nights before you went out," recalls Horkan. "I wasn't the debating type myself, but I liked to have a vote for the auditorship."

Speakers at L&H debates over the years include the late Dermot Bouchier Hayes, Richard Johnson, Louis Courtney, Charles Lysaght and Maevie Binchy. "Listening to some of them debate would make you wonder how they could ever amount to anything. But they did," jokes Horkan.

Sport was also as much a part of UCD student life then as it is now. Horkan played soccer and badminton.

The badminton club had been set up by a number of Malayan medicine students in the 1960s and became the breeding ground for some of Ireland's best-known female players: Mary O'Sullivan and Hazel Irwin, as well as Maureen O'Brien and Patricia O'Gorman, who both became tennis internationals.

The student media kept Earlsfort Terrace authorities on its toes. "We started with a newspaper called You-Who, but it got banned because they printed a cartoon of a girl with a small bump on her belly standing outside a door with a sign saying Chaplain's Office," states Horkan.

After this small editorial hitch, a new paper, Awake came into being. "Awake was a great institution," says Horkan. "It was a wholly independent paper brought out in the college with some very good editors over the years."

There were also a number of staff members in Earlsfort Terrace who made more of an impact on life in the college than they might have known. The porters, who went about their daily duties, became the friends and role models of many students.

"Paddy Keogh, who joined in 1918, was well loved by everyone," says Horkan. "We all called him Mr Keogh, and he would always call you Mr Horkan. Only when you qualified would he call you by your first name."

"If a lecturer was out sick he would come into the hall and give a little discourse on one subject or another. He was a lovely man and knew everybody in the college. Then there was Jack Nugent who lived in the basement of the building. He got on well with 'the Machine' and used to let us sneak into the building the weekend before student elections to put up posters before anyone else."

Very little in student life, it appears, has changed.

Being predictable can be brilliant

Particularly when your average return is over 10% a year*

Steve Davis isn't known for varying his routine. But with 73 professional snooker titles under his belt, he does prove that being predictable can be brilliant – a bit like the Irish Life Consensus Fund. Consistently among the highest performing funds in Ireland.

Irish Life

the Consensus Fund has given an average return of over 10% a year over the past 10 years. To find out how you can get more for your money contact your financial adviser, drop into your local permanent tsb branch or contact Irish Life.

Warning: The value of your investment may go down as well as up. Warning: This fund may be affected by changes in currency exchange rates. Warning: Past performance is not a reliable guide to future performance.

*Past performance figure is over a 10 year period from the 31 December 1996 to 31 December 2006 and is not a reliable guide to future performance. Irish Life & Permanent plc (trading as permanent tsb) and Irish Life Assurance plc are regulated by the Financial Regulator. Irish Life & Permanent plc is a listed insurance agent for Irish Life Assurance plc.

As you were: a stand at UCD Freshers Week at Earlsfort Terrace in the 1960s. Photograph: Bill Hastings